used place for routing device inspection. Service Area

The fact that your request contains the appropriate contact information, and possibly an e-mail address, helps to make or break the issue. Some systems use an out-of-the-box approach to issue tracking — for example, using the keyword “tickets” to refer to issues, and a menu item/URL/form field that lets you enter a list of the ones you’ve already received. Depending on your system, you may need to create a ticket or issue type, assign a ticket/issue type to an issue, edit the “assigned to me” section of a ticket/issue type, and assign the issue/ticket to the team. More information on how this works for your platform. Report Type

The type of report you request depends on the circumstances of the ticket. For example, if you receive an unexpected error on a service, you might simply want to know what type of error it was. This would be a Critical issue, and you should log it as a separate issue. If you were having trouble with your site, you might make a minor issue or contribute a code change. You also can provide additional details on your issue type. This example shows how to make the issue critical, with an optional quick solution. In this case, the issue was a link that no longer works. The full issue details include a diagnosis and further information. Summary

Issue tracking is an important part of your service-oriented architecture. In fact, it’s so important that a service’s ability to track and report on issues is a key differentiator for your service. Each system has its own approach to issue tracking, and you need to learn the nuances of your own system. However, the common threads to successful issue tracking include the following: The basic format of an issue (ticket), including an appropriate title, description, priority, due date, assignee, and (optionally) a quick solution. Each ticket (issue) should have a unique ticket number. Your service should keep a record of this. This number should be mentioned in the issue title, description, and summary. An issue (ticket) should be linked to the appropriate ticket issue type. If you’re unsure what the issue type would be for a ticket, you may need to ask your service vendor what it is. A reply to the ticket
